the vagina monologue.

David Smiedt explains why so-called “neatness” doesn’t matter down there.

have never met a vagina I didn't like. There have been redheads, bushes, baldies and crop tops.

And taut, squishy, fleshy, and minimal ones. And I've rejoiced in every one of them. So much so, that I've pretty much called out God's name each time.

Which is why this man was astounded to recently read that there are women out there who feel their boy-howdy doesn't tick the requisite aesthetic boxes. And that they were made to feel this way by a moronic male minority who've loudly espoused their preferences for “neat” vaginas.

This lead to a Googling of the term “labiaplasty” and the discovery that increasing numbers of Aussie women are submitting to the expensive 90-minute operation, which combats the “problem” of protruding labia minora.

This is wrong on a fistful of levels. First up, in an era where females are made to feel insecure about everything, from cellulite and breast size to butt-cheek droop and naturally expressive foreheads, do we really need to add genital vulnerability to the mix? Point is, unless you can't go commando in shorts without overhang, your vagina is fine as it is.

Which brings me to point No.2. It's not like us men are exactly oil paintings downstairs. As actor/comedian Robin Williams once observed, a flaccid, circumcised penis looks like a snail wearing a helmet, while an uncut one resembles a snake in a turtleneck. Add God's personal joke that is the scrotum - nothing says sexy like a hairy purse made from elbow skin - and throw in the odd banana curve and it's a wonder that women venture down there at all. What I'm trying to say is men are hardly in a position to be casting judgement when it comes to genital aesthetics.

So what if your vagina looks like a badly packed kebab? Any guy fortunate enough to be allowed into your pleasure palace should be grateful for the invitation. If, for some reason, he doesn't like the front gates, the invitation should immediately be rendered null and void.

Yes, some blokes prefer the porn star “coin slot” look, but that doesn't apply to the majority of us, who find ourselves grateful to merely be in the proximity of a vagina. Any male who tells you otherwise is a liar. In fact, he's most likely carrying the same amount of insecurity as he's busy instilling.

All that remains to be said on this matter is this: Read my lips - there's no such thing as an ugly vagina. □
